

I have to say that I disapprove of this approach for the simple reason that it could effectively remove my ability of watching programs & broadcasts at a time of my choosing, and not the networks. This 'timeshifting' capability is the very benefit that VCR's provide with standard television broadcasts, with which I've come to depend on because I already am working long hours as a tech worker. Plus, I don't see any real benefit (for the consumer) by possibly having the consumer work additional hours simply to keep up with their current level of broadcast media 'consumption' which this copyright protection mandate could conceivably inadvertantly impose upon the public.
